

Selling Loans to Wall Street: What Actually Matters

It's not about your best loans. It's about your most consistent process.

The originator, not the collateral

When an aggregator evaluates a pool of RTL or bridge loans, the first underwrite is on the lender. Consistent pricing methodology, reliable documentation, stable process — these tell the buyer whether the next pool will look like this one.

Pricing variance that can't be explained

If similar deals in your tape price differently and you can't show why — different borrower profiles, documented exceptions — the buyer prices in uncertainty. That becomes a lower bid or a pass.

Documentation that doesn't require reconstruction

Serviceable tapes have origination records, property valuations, and servicing data in standard format. If an analyst needs to call you to make the tape usable, you're starting from a disadvantage.

The tape already exists when you need it

By the time you're ready to have an institutional capital conversation, your last 12–24 months of origination history is already written. Build a consistent, auditable process before you need to show it.

Operational readiness > volume

The operators accessing institutional capital on the best terms aren't always the largest. They're the most legible. Consistent pricing. Clean documentation. Auditable process.
